Great resource for community-engaged theatre (or any drama setting)By Joshua PattonJohnston is concerned with a participatory approach to creating theatre in which a community of nonprofessional actors comes together to create meaningful representations of their own stories. His approach supports the proposition that there is great value in the process of creation as opposed to the spectacle or performance product. This practical publication brings together his underpinning philosophy, a perspective into his experiences with facilitating theatre in communities and an analysis of the effectiveness of his framework for action (games, exercises and techniques that he has found useful for his purposes). The games in this resource are especially useful to my theatre classrooms. They are well written and easy to understand. His process is one that I am intrigued by and I will continue to use this resource over and over again. 0 of 0 people found the following review helpful. Great Book. An immensely valuable resource book for drama leaders, House of Games is a how-to book for building up drama troupes and keeping them creative. House of Games is sure to take its place alongside the most established drama method texts.

"This is an excellent resource book for anyone involved in participatory drama' Guild of Drama Adjudicators Newsletter 'It is friendly, accessible, well structured and full of good advice - much of it plain common sense... Reading it is like being in a room buzzing with relaxed and informed conversation about basic principles, and good ruses for realising both general and specific aims.' Mick Wallis, Theatre Research International 'House of Games is a book I will return to and learn much from' Dorinda Hulton, Studies in Theatre Production" About the Author Chris Johnston currently leads the Insight Arts Trust in Islington, London. He has been active in drama instruction for twenty years.
